

Surname Frequency and Stamp Collectors

R. D. ROBERTS

ANY POPULAR BOOK about surnames for the American reader should deal with those most familiar to him. That is, it should concern the surnames most common in the United States. The author of such a book needs to ascertain which are the most common American surnames and he should make an effort to determine the meanings and origins of as many of them as he can.

The basis, then, for a book of this kind must be a representative sampling of American surnames. The requirement that the sample be representative is not easily met. An American of a particular national origin is more likely to favor certain trades, religious sects, and clubs or fraternal orders than others. He is more likely to set up his home in some parts of the country than others.

It is likely, therefore, that any occupational, religious, fraternal, or regional list of names will be biased in favor of names from one or two languages.

For these reasons, any list in private hands is likely to fall short of the ideal in some degree. We may presume, however, that the customer list of a mail order house—if the firm handles merchandise of general appeal, and the customers were obtained through national advertising—forms a representative sample of the American population.

It is on this presumption that I have compiled the accompanying table. It is to be the foundation of the books about American surnames which I have in progress. It results from the tabulation of the names of 52,952 persons, living in the United States and its territories, who made purchases from my mail order business (R. D. Roberts & Co., postage stamp dealers and importers) during the years 1938 through 1943. They were obtained almost entirely through advertising in publications of national circulation. The table includes all names which appeared eight or more times in the sample. It is, as far as I know, the most extensive table of the sort in existence.

Stamp collecting is the most popular American hobby. There are no financial, physical, or educational requirements, nor is stamp collecting confined to any particular parts of the country. Its eight million followers make up a fair cross section of the total literate population.

This tabulation is to be considered as a moderately satisfactory listing of the most common surnames in the United States; it is one man's approach to the problem of which names should be used as the basis for a book about surnames for the American reader.

The following list is based on the 1146 most common surnames. The number in front of the name designates the order of commonness; the number after the name indicates the frequency distribution per 100,000 persons.
