D. K. Tucker is an aeronautical and electrical engineer, emphasizing operational research and information engineering. He is the author-builder of the Nagen name register which allows the insertion of any forename or surname found in the United States into any system which incorporates names, such as lists of customers or employees. His onomastic interests are in the relationships between forenames and surnames and the statistical predictability of ethnic, cultural, and language sources of either or both. A recent article (with Patrick Hanks), "A Diagnostic Database of American Personal Names," appeared in the March 2000 issue of Names. Cynthia Whissell is in the Department of Psychology, Laurentian University, Sudbury, P3E 2C6, Ontario. Her research is focused on emotion in language and she is currently investigating emotion in words, which will result in a dictionary of affect, and emotion in sounds. These investigations are in response to the notion that the importance of emotion has been undervalued in psychological research, although it guides behavior in subtle ways that are often inaccessible to conscious thought. cwhissell@nickel.laurentian.ca
