Martha Rainbolt is Professor of English at DePauw University, Greencastle, IN 46135. Her recent research is focuses on late 17th and early 18th century women poets' use of naming as a means of establishing themselves as writers. An earlier article examined these writers' use of Sappho's name and reputation as a lyric poet to authenticate their writing and their lives as writers. rainbolt@depauw.edu

D. K. Tucker is an aeronautical and electrical engineer, emphasizing operational research and information engineering. He is the author-builder of the Nagen name register which allows the insertion of any forename or surname found in the United States into any system which incorporates names, such as lists of customers or employees. His onomastic interests are in the relationships between forenames and surnames and the statistical predictability of ethnic, cultural, and language sources of either or both. A companion article, "Distribution of Forenames, Surnames, and Forename-Surname Pairs in the United States," appeared in the June 2001 issue of Names. Wilbur Zelinsky is Professor Emeritus of Geography at The Pennsylvania State University, University Park, PA 16802. A long-term interest in the geography of names fits within a larger concern with the social and cultural geography of North America. His most recent major publication is The Enigma of Ethnicity: Another American Dilemma, published by the University of Iowa Press in 2001.
